Electronic Virtuosos Enliven Performances

Sometimes, the new digital instruments require playing in a style that resembles performance art. Dan Brotman, a native New Yorker, built the Shaka, a six-foot piece of metal across which he has strung eight thick bass piano strings. The strings are suspended above the beam, mounted on bridges and hooked up to electronic panels, and large guitar pickups that amplify and control the sound. Mr. Brotman, who performs in New York clubs under the name Droids On Acid, plays the strings percussively, hitting them with mallets, sticks and guitar-type slides. He has used the instrument to record his latest release on the influential New York label, FutureMusic.

Like his fellow innovators, Mr. Brotman is interested in creating a performance that excites audiences. "I'm trying to engage the crowd and give them something that they haven't heard before," he said. "When most people come out to a club, they expect to see a DJ mixing records or on CDJs, which is pretty boring visually. When I perform, it's an event," he said.

Mr. Brotman's inventions have also opened doors for him to work on some exciting projects. "After a performance in Los Angeles, I was approached by David Was and Chris Carter to remix The Theme To The X-Files for the movie soundtrack. I don't think they had any idea what they had gotten themselves into," he laughs.

Released on January 14, 2025, all proceeds from the compilation goes to support Doctors Without Borders.
